First colour newspaper pictures

The Illustrated London News illustrations go online

A DIGITIZATION PROJECT by Gale, part of Cengage Learning, and the Illustrated London News Limited is offering family historians the chance to view the events of the past through the eyes of their ancestors. The first fully illustrated weekly newspaper, begun in 1842, the ILN was hugely popular. The paper was also the first to print colour illustrations, from 1855, and now nearly three-quarters of a million full-colour pictures and photographs are available, providing an unrivalled pictorial chronicle of Britain and the world from the early Victorian era to the late 20th century.

Although the new archive will initially only be available through subscribing institutions, it’s worth finding out if your local library or university plan to make it available in the future, as it’s doubtless of great interest to family historians. As Seth Cayley, publisher at Gale, has said, ‘the Illustrated London News Historical Archive 1842–2003 will help students, enthusiasts and those interested in genealogy to research social history, fashion, theatre, media, literature, advertising, graphic design and politics... As an eyewitness to the past, it offers pictorial insight into events across the world.’

NAS document reveals Nessie’s government protection

IN THE 1930s the Loch Ness legend presented Scottish ministers with a unique problem, as a government file at the NAS (HH1/588) attests. After alleged sightings in 1933 the Scottish Office was asked to confirm the existence of a ‘sea serpent’ in the loch. A question was tabled in the Commons (and ridiculed by the press) asking whether there would be an investigation.

It was proposed that observers could take photographs, and aerial observation was suggested. It was decided, though, to leave the monster be. But monster hunters continued to congregate and the government questioned whether to protect ‘Nessie’. A letter from the Chief Constable of Inverness-shire, when confronted with one expedition, concluded ‘that there is some strange creature seems now beyond doubt’. Meanwhile, Nessie continues to appear ... For the full story, visit www.nas.gov.uk. The documents are part of the NAS’s Open Secret exhibition (until 30 June).
